with materialism, rationalism and imperialistic undertones. Refusing to act for "development" should, however, by no means lead to the rejection of international solidarity among and in favour of the oppressed, as reactionary minds would be prone to suggest.

The crisis of the Third World is not essentially economic or technical. It is fundamentally cultural and spiritual. However, identifying cultural degradation as one of the main causes of the problems of the Third World would be yet another manifestation of western paternalism, if it were not combined with the recognition that the same phenomenon occurs in the West. We are both the victims and the vehicles of values which dehumanize all of us, in the South as well as in the North. Third World peoples can - and already do - help the West in rediscovering values which were allowed to wither away, just as westerners have something to offer to others as well. This is how international cooperation can finally become a genuine two-way traffic. Raimundo Panikkar thinks that the best assistance to be offered by westerners is to say how they themselves have been affected by the deadening effects of the pan-economic, mega-technological system. Sharing alternative social experiments can be very valuable, more so than giving recipes which only increase the grip of the system on local people! The Third World is not an empty hole to be filled with our money, gadgets and good intentions, but a mystery to explore, a wealth to be discovered.

Progressive Christian agencies have a key role to play in facilitating this new type of international solidarity, where respect for the culture of people at the base is central. Obviously such respect for local culture must not lead to conservatism or romantic idealization and must be combined with close attention to local class conflicts and power struggles. Missionaries have recently paid commendable attention to inculturation of Christianity. What about inculturation of "development"? There are plenty of books about the former issue, but very few on the latter.

More and more individuals are becoming aware of the need to reflect afresh on this issue. An international network, "South - North, Cultures and Development", was launched recently by EECOD (European Ecumenical Organization for Development), an important advocacy and research group attached to the EEC. (The Lomé III Convention is the first international covenant stressing the vital importance of strengthening cultural identity in any meaningful process of development.)

Talking about culture may appear to be a shocking luxury when millions of people are dying from hunger. But it is not. One should never sacrifice what is important in order to tend to what is urgent. The issue of culture and (versus?) development is vitally important, both for the Third World and for the West. It is its very neglect which helped bring about the present tragedy.
